

The Cambridge Law Review (CLR) is inviting applications for positions on the Managing Board of Volume V of the CLR. Volume V will run during the academic year 2019–2020.

About the CLR

The CLR is an independent legal publication run by students of the University of Cambridge which aims to provide a forum for the discussion of contemporary and cutting-edge legal issues. The journal welcomes contemporary submissions on issues relating to all common law jurisdictions, or those with a former connection to the English common law; European law; international law; comparative pieces; as well as interdisciplinary legal scholarship that has regard to economics and political studies. The CLR publishes two issues a year.

3. Applications are now being considered for the following positions:
 - Editor-in-Chief
 - Vice Editors-in-Chief
 - Managing Editor
4. The Editor-in-Chief is responsible for all aspects of the CLR and its subsidiary undergraduate journal, De Lege Ferenda. Administratively, this includes, but is not limited to: calling for submissions; managing the Editorial Board and the blind review process; maintaining the CLR's website; running events as well as a lecture series; publicity; corresponding with the Honorary Board; and the publication of the Review. The Vice Editors-in-Chief support the EIC in their role. Substantively, the EIC and VEICs are required to assess submissions shortlisted following the blind review, and determine the articles most suitable for publication. As submissions often deal with fairly niche points of law, Editors are expected to be academically capable; to be able to assess complex legal arguments in areas of law with which they may not be familiar; and to be adept at engaging their Editorial Board in discussions during the review process.
5. The Managing Editor's role is less broadly administrative and is largely substantive. The ME has the focused job of overseeing the substantive review of submissions, as well as the substantive and technical editing of the articles selected for publication in both Issues 1 (spring 2020) and 2 (autumn 2020) of Volume V.
6. Applications may be submitted here: www.cambridgelawreview.org/managingboardapplication. Applicants are required to provide a short write-up and their CV.
